

MOOLIGHTING IDOL HAS WEBBED FEET OF CLAY

If you're a loyal fan of camp mascot Placido Flamingo, you may imagine that his life in the off-season is one big unending round of parties, ski trips to Stowe and glamorous book signing appearances at places like the Four Seasons and Chucky Cheese's. But your intrepid photographers at the Flamingo Times have stumbled on the shabby truth behind the shimmering facade, when they happened to wander into a "novelty" shop in the run-down heart of Providence, Rhode Island.

There, amidst the greeting cards featuring crabby old ladies and the rubber fake vomit, we found the supposed highflyer and sexual adventurer sheepishly sporting an ill-fitting mackinaw and touting his services to any and all who came by. It turns out that in the off season, Placido's supposed high-profile modeling career is closer to a kind of cheap exhibitionism: standing on suburban lawns in various costumes, whatever the weather like some over-eager hobo.

When he saw our cameras, the blushing bird begged us not to publish his sordid secret, but we are loyal servants of truth here at the FT and we are not to be bought off. Especially not buy someone with so little available ready cash. (A hasty rummage through Placido's pockets turned up no pocket change. In fact, it turned up no pockets either.)

Now that his gallivanting image is tarnished, Placido's tenure at LR may well be drawing to a close. As of Wednesday, no-one was sure of his whereabouts, and a camp spokesman was openly musing that it "might be time to move on to some other damn bird, maybe a penguin".
